

Climate Apartheid?

If you thought the cabal pushing catastrophic man-caused climate change couldn't get any more hysterical or manipulative... well, you would be wrong. A new report from the United Nations Human Rights Council has just linked climate change to the racism of apartheid.

Apartheid? Really? Terms like "climate crisis," or "climate emergency" are no longer enough to scare people? Look... everyone knows the U.N. is pushing for a one-world government that it controls, but do they really have to stoop to this level, pitting one group of people against another? Whatever happened to the goal of uniting people?

In this new report, the lead propagandist says that poorer countries have contributed the least to greenhouse gas emissions and yet these nations will suffer the most. And since these poorer nations are mostly non-white, that's where the racism comes in. The U.N. claims the predicted catastrophe is more likely to happen if we only rely on the private sector to deal with the effects of climate change. The effort must be mobilized by governments that are united in the crusade. Well, isn't that convenient for the U.N. and the socialist countries that control it?

What's particularly disgusting about this so-called report is that news organizations, including FOX News, just report what the U.N. says without doing an interview with one of the dozens of climatologists who disagree with the catastrophic assertions of climate alarmists.

Here's an idea. Instead of trying to fan the flames of class warfare, maybe the U.N. should instead work on real solutions, such as helping people in developing nations get affordable, reliable, energy. That would help poor countries right away and if the climate does present more problems for man-made or natural reasons, these nations will be wealthier and better able to deal with it.

But that kind of thinking doesn't make sense when the U.N.'s true goal is to use climate change as a pretext to achieve its obvious agenda of global socialism. Shame on the U.N. for being so calculating, cynical, and divisive.
